Hirsch masterfully tells the grueling, sometimes funny, and, finally, tragic story of the life and death of his son, Gabriel, in a commanding and propulsive book-length poem. Written in tercets (three-line stanzas) bereft of punctuation, Gabriel takes us through a childhood brutally hijacked by strangely tumultuous brain chemistry and the torments of cruelly tested parenthood.

In his new book-length poem Gabriel, Edward Hirsch has given his dead son a proper send off and he has begun the task of placing the boy's life in some sort of perspective. It takes a special lens. Gabriel was an adopted child born with a mysterious developmental disorder that made him impetuous, impatient, and loud. No school could hold him.

"Many of the very greatest poems seem as if they were written in blood," Edward Hirsch once wrote. So it is with his magnificent, harrowing Gabriel (2014), a book-length poem that anatomizes Hirsch's grief over the death in 2011, at the age of twenty-two, of his son. Gabriel is an elegy, a confession, a howl. It's a poem steeped in literary history but also fluent in contemporary idiom and reference (the poem's epigraph comes from a Blink-182 song).

The shadow of death and bereavement, or how the "naked self faces the abyss of death," haunts Hirsch's work, nowhere more evidently than in his 2014 book-length elegy Gabriel A Poem, written for his son Gabriel, who died suddenly from a party drug overdose. Formed from a dossier that Hirsch collected in the years following Gabriel's death, the elegy follows the heart-wrenching odyssey of a parent's irretrievable loss.
